SOL Testing Targets Sentence Formation/Grammar/Mechanics

For the Virginia Writing SOL tests, all surface features of writing are in one large domain – the usage/mechanics domain. As a result, the list of features for each grade level looks long, even for grade five. But they're not, really. Of all the fifty-eleven million rules for grammar usage, mechanics, and sentence construction, only major ones are listed – and only those anyone might reasonably assume to be a part of the Standards of Learning's "edit for grammar and mechanics" at the three grade levels. When one looks at the three lists, one does see differences. The lists grow with each grade level, as do students' abilities to deal with surface features. The following tables display the word-level grammar skills and cuing systems that make up the list in the SOL Writing Test blueprints for grades 5, 8 and 11.

Instructional Scope and Sequence THE EDITING PROCESS

Introduce (I) basic editing skills (capitals and periods) to respond to during editing process = grade 1.

Build (B) skill with increasing standard of grammar and mechanics knowledge applied during editing = grading 2-6.

Maintain (M) skill with grammar and mechanics during editing process = grades 7-12.

Strengthen (S), as needed, those skills marked "S" during the editing conferences.

Spell checks and grammar/style checks = Introduce in grade 7; Maintain in grades 8-12.

While having a writing curriculum helps with the "what" to teach at which grade levels, it doesn't help with the day-to-day management of the writing workshop. Teachers, however, develop many good management tools. For example, many teachers have their students keep personal usage and mechanics sheets in their writing folders or working portfolios. On these, students record the usage and mechanics problems the teacher or their piers find in their papers; then, they use this list for personal editing. Because these problems are theirs, not a list from the editing board that they were told to copy, students solve these personal editing problems (unlike the grammar gook lessons they never seem to transfer into their own writing).
